You’ve stepped inside history.

This historic landmark set in the vast West Texas landscape has a rich history that started in the early 1900s. Rio Vista, which served first as an orphanage and later as the U. S. headquarters for the Bracero Program, tells the story of migration, oppression and triumph in the American experience.

It remains a testament to the contributions of the many skilled Mexican guest workers, known as braceros, brought into the U.S. to aid with farm labor shortages during and after World War II. The term bracero comes from brazo or arm, signifying that the men worked with their arms and hands.

This guide will help you discover the evolution and expansion of Rio Vista Farm. As you explore the site, take a moment to reflect on the civic and social services Rio Vista played in American history.

Did you know? Though the Bracero Program ended decades ago, millions of Mexican Americans can trace their roots to their fathers’ or grandfathers’ entry into the U.S. as braceros. To learn more about the Bracero Program, go to page 8.
Braceros recall having meals made up of rice, beans, and cabbage.

Braceros were selected and hired for jobs in this 1951 building.

Braceros were selected and hired for jobs in this 1951 building.

Rio Vista Farm

All of the buildings in red were built for the Bracero Program.
Braceros used all the buildings shown on this map, including two that have since been demolished.

Braceros visited the Mexican Consulate here.
During the early 20th century, a number of impoverished individuals came to El Paso County seeking services for orphaned children, the homeless, and elderly residents who lacked the means for self-support. In response to this growing need, the county opened a second County Poor Farm in 1916 at Rio Vista Farm in the rural town of Socorro. Poor farms were established as a part of the Texas Constitution of 1896 and provided public assistance for destitute residents in need of care and support.

The original site of the El Paso County Poor Farm is the 1916 Prairie-style building, historically known as the Main Building. The brick Main Building was designed in an X-shaped layout with four wards or wings that served as dormitories for boys, girls, men, and women. The central corridor functioned as a community room for play and afternoon leisure. Known as the local “communal colony,” this system provided impoverished individuals and families room and board for nearly 50 years. To visit the Main Building, see the map on page 2 and find the building marked in yellow.

FUN FACT
Did you know that the Rio Vista Farm is rumored to be haunted? Locals say that they have seen ghosts resembling women and children roaming the property.

BELOW: Map of Texas highlighting Rio Vista Farm

RIO VISTA FARM TIMELINE

- 1915–1964 El Paso County Poor Farm
- 1935–1936 New Deal programs and transient labor camp
- 1951–1964 Bracero Reception Center
- 1994 Rio Vista Community Recreation Center opens
- 1997 Listed in the National Register of Historic Places
- 2015 Included on Texas Most Endangered Places list
- 2016 Declared a National Treasure by National Trust for Historic Preservation
- 2017 Bracero History Summit marks 75th anniversary of first braceros admitted into the U.S.
After the stock market crash of 1929, millions of Americans lost their jobs and savings amid the Great Depression, and federal and state programs for indigent populations were created to provide relief to the most vulnerable citizens.

As the County Poor Farm, Rio Vista’s population grew during the Great Depression when the farm was host to a variety of President Franklin D. Roosevelt’s New Deal public relief programs. In the 1930s, County Commissioners started planning a transient labor camp and selected the Rio Vista County Poor Farm as their new location. Through various state and federal employment projects, like the Works Projects Administration and the Civilian Conservation Corps, construction broke ground in 1935 to create the County Poor Farm Transient Camp. The transient camp’s public work relief projects employed, fed, and sheltered over 100 workers. Individuals worked six-hour days in exchange for room at Rio Vista and $1 a week. Transient camp laborers farmed the surrounding fields, expanded the Main Building, made adobe bricks, paved Rio Vista Road, and made furniture in exchange for food, housing, clothes, and medical attention. They also built sixteen of the adobe Mission Revival style structures. Most of these buildings remain today and give the site its distinctive rectangular shape.

You can identify these buildings by their adobe brick, stucco coating, and curved parapets—all signature architectural features of the Mission Revival style, a prominent style in the southwest. These buildings are highlighted in blue on Rio Vista’s site map located on page 2. Laborers also built a mess hall, infirmaries, a bathhouse, dormitories, and recreation rooms. These buildings served the labor camp, County Poor Farm, and later the braceros.

FUN FACT
Rio Vista Farm was one of the filming locations for Steven Soderbergh’s movie, Traffic (2000).

MISSION REVIVAL STYLE ARCHITECTURE:
A late 19th and 20th-century style that interprets the Spanish Colonial missions. These missions were built by Catholic priests and Indigenous people throughout the southwestern United States.

KEY FEATURES:
1. Curved parapet or bell gable
2. Square complex and courtyard
3. White plaster (stucco) walls
4. Low pitched roof lines
5. Handmade adobe brick

ABOVE: Mission Revival style building at Rio Vista was once a recreation hall for the County Poor Farm, by Kip Malone
The Bracero Program

Rio Vista Farm echoes with the bittersweet stories of braceros, skilled Mexican laborers hired between 1942-1964 to fill railroad and agricultural labor shortages throughout the United States. The Bracero Program is the nation’s most expansive guest worker program, created by the federal government in part because of America’s extreme labor shortage during World War II. The United States and Mexican government negotiated a series of agreements that allowed for the recruitment of temporary Mexican laborers to enter the U.S. Over the 22 years of the Bracero Program, labor efforts sponsored an estimated 4.6 million contracts for guest workers from Mexico.

Seeking financial stability and prosperity, braceros waited for weeks at recruiting stations in Mexico, and came to the United States leaving behind wives, children, parents, their culture, and the only language they knew. Large farm associations, growers, food processors, and individual farmers sought labor assistance from braceros throughout the U.S., with a concentration in Texas, Arizona, Arkansas, Colorado, California, and New Mexico. The braceros were selected by growers to harvest vegetables, fruits, and cotton.

Americans and politicians celebrated braceros for assisting with U.S. labor shortages and war efforts. In 1942, the first group of contracted braceros entered through El Paso, Texas, to work in the sugar beet harvest in Stockton, California. When they arrived at the California train station, welcome signs, musicians, and supporters greeted the men.

While the program promised good pay, housing, food, insurance, and other necessary accommodations, many describe this period as “legalized slavery.” Men were bused across the country to contribute to America’s agricultural economies in harsh and oftentimes inhumane working conditions. Some employers charged men inflated prices for room and board, leaving them to earn just pennies a week after their difficult work.

To support the expanding Bracero Program, in 1951 the federal government transformed Rio Vista Farm’s quadrangle into the Bracero Program’s U.S. headquarters and the first permanent reception and contracting center located along the US-Mexico border. At Rio Vista, the U.S. Department of Labor contracted up to 1,500 men a day, and it is estimated that in 1956 alone over 86,000 contracts were processed at this site.

FUN FACT

The El Paso Region remains a large agricultural region known for its Pima cotton production and pecan orchards.

OPPOSITE: Temporary clerks were proficient in both English and Spanish at the Reception Center; courtesy USCIS History Library

ABOVE: Bracero loading for transportation to farm, courtesy USCIS History Library
Rio Vista Farm

BRACERO RECEPTION & CONTRACTING CENTER

From 1951 to 1964, Rio Vista Farm served as the Bracero Program’s U.S. headquarters by making use of the existing Main Building and County Poor Farm Transient Camp adobe structures. As a Bracero Reception and Contracting Center, these buildings were reused as bracero dormitories, federal administration offices, a mess hall, recreation room, and medical examination rooms. Braceros began arriving at Rio Vista in September 1951, with most men coming from the migratory station in Chihuahua, Mexico.

To further fulfill the needs of a contracting site, the U.S. Department of Labor, U.S. Public Health Service, and U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service built two large structures for dormitories and an interview selection building. The 1951 bracero-era interview selection building still exists today and is the only wooden structure located in the quadrangle. Also added were concrete block restrooms, as well as concrete drinking water fountains and shaded structures to protect men from the harsh West Texas sun and shelter them as they awaited their day-long hiring process.

Visitors can still see remnants of signs in Spanish by visiting the escusado (bathroom) on the north side of the quadrangle.

Those that passed through Rio Vista—more than 880,000 braceros—endured terrible food and humiliating and arduous medical and psychological examinations. The braceros were stripped of their clothing, organized into lines, underwent day-long examinations, and fumigated with toxic chemicals like DDT before being hired by the contractors. Former braceros vividly recall that interviewers thoroughly inspected the men’s hands for callouses to see if they were used to physical labor. Men also remember the bologna sandwich they were provided. For some, it was the first time they had eaten meat in a long time. To see where the braceros were sprayed with DDT, look for the Quonset hut—the long metal building near the front of the quadrangle.

FUN FACT

“Bracero” is a Spanish word for manual laborer, literally: “one who swings his arms.”
As the owner of Rio Vista, the City of Socorro is dedicated to the rehabilitation and maintenance of this important historical landmark. The once poor farm, Depression-era transient camp, and bracero reception and contracting center is now a community center and beloved historic site. For its role in Texas and American history, it is listed on the National Register of Historic Places and is historically designated as a Texas State Antiquities Landmark by the state of Texas, and as a National Treasure by the National Trust for Historic Preservation.

DID YOU KNOW? In 2014, the City committed over $1 million to help restore Rio Vista Farm.

---

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS:

This research and publication was funded by H-E-B’s Community Investment Program and the National Trust for Historic Preservation.

PARTNERS:

It is with sincere gratitude that we acknowledge the role and preservation assistance from the National Trust for Historic Preservation, the Texas Historical Commission, National Park Service, the Summerlee Foundation, the University of Texas at El Paso Borderlands Institute of Oral History and Dr. Yolanda Chávez Leyva, the El Paso Community Foundation, Preservation Texas, Front Range Research Associates, Preservation Professional Sehila Mota Casper, City of Socorro, TX Staff, City Historic Preservation Officer Victor M. Reta Jr., and its community members.

Special thanks to all of the braceros for sharing their stories and for their hard work.
The National Trust for Historic Preservation, a privately funded nonprofit organization, works to save America’s historic places.